Here are some response extracts:

It is difficult to believe that those to whom we look to protect us can be so adamant "they" are right, even in the face of incontrovertible evidence. Shirley's plight serves as a salutary lesson to us all as to what can happen when might triumphs over right

Just read the key 10 points referred to on your web site. I have to say that I have had only a fleeting knowledge of the background to the case. Having read the ten key points it is quite staggering that Shirley has not been unequivocally cleared of any wrong-doing. Any layman reading the facts presented in the 10 point plan, I am sure, could only shake a head in disappointment and disbelief that the "system" has not had the integrity to admit failure of titanic proportions. An effective criminal justice system should be able to proudly affirm that they got it wrong and, as far as possible, make redress for such a stupendous error of misidentification which has really ruined the life of a first class young police officer. That the criminal justice system(in its widest sense) in Scotland has had to be dragged screaming and shouting to the altars of justice speaks volumes of how "the system" is protected by those who should be honest enough to admit that "they got it wrong," and ensure that Shirley's nightmare is ended. I suspect that most folk are not aware of the irrefutable body of evidence pointing conclusively to her total innocence and what amounts to a terrible miscarriage of justice. Tragic that anyone should have been put through years of hurt when fingerprint experts across the globe were able to demonstrate the FP evidence was simply wrong. The justice system relies on "experts" at its peril and there needs to be rigorous testing and re-testing of fingerprint evidence rather than the assumption that experts must be right and therefore cannot and should not be challenge. These are my thoughts on this matter after reading your circular. I wish you and Shirley well and hope that justice is indeed done. Cheers

It is good to hear from you even if it is to say that Shirley is still fighting to have "the establishment" admit they made a mistake.

K

Nice idea. Hope they draw some answers - proper answers.

L

There is No need - I for one believe that Shirley is an innocent victim of the Police

P

The Police seem to be above corruption, above reproach and worst of all above the Law as if they can re-write it too suit their definition - Judge John Deed totalitarianism I rest my case.

R

Shirley has my vote any day - The Police do NOT and never will until they admit fault publicly and become accountable

M

Stay strong, don't allow yourself to give up the power you have, don't let them bring you down .Life is too short. Regards.

You know you have my support, anyway, and feel free to publicise it in any way you think fit.
